Given the current trends there may come a time in the very near future where PyTorch and TensorFlow hold adoption positions of parity in the machine learning world. This isn't to say that PyTorch is "better" than TensorFlow, but having options in terms of tools, tools which have relative strengths and differing implementation philosophies, is always a good thing.

OpenAI is Adopting PyTorch... They Aren't Alone

Financial and banking services company Standard Chartered turned to a model intelligence platform to get a clearer picture of how its algorithms make decisions on customer data. How machine learning comes to conclusions and produces results can be a bit mysterious, even to the teams that develop the algorithms that drive them -- the so-called black box problem.

Also, General Motors' unsuccessful implementation of automated manufacturing in the 1980s—quality declined and sales fell accordingly—soured many big companies on the concept back then. That said, there are many thriving examples of dark factories around the world. Many machine shops in the U.S. run “unattended” all or part of the time.
