How it Works: Although many individuals have a revocable trust as part of their estate plan, these same individuals frequently own assets outright at the time of their death. While this may be intentional, more often than not it is because the grantor, like your father, simply never completed the necessary paperwork.

What Happens if the Trust is Not Funded? - Linda Toga Law

Assets in an irrevocable trust are not owned in your name, and therefore, are not part of the probated estate. When you or your spouse (if they are part of the trust) pass away, any assets put into an irrevocable trust are not included in the estate for the calculation of Medicaid recovery, the estate tax, or probate.

Can an Irrevocable Trust Protect Your Assets From Medicaid?

Not quite. A will can contain wording to create a testamentary trust to save estate taxes, care for minors, etc. But, because it's part of your will, this trust cannot go into effect until after you die and the will is probated. So it does not avoid probate and provides no protection at incapacity.
